Fauquier County EMS captain tells other women: 'You can do it'

Number of women working as first responders locally slowly rises

By Colleen LaMay
FAUQUIER TIMES STAFF WRITER

To become a firefighter-paramedic, EMS Capt. Jessica Potter had to climb multiple flights of stairs carrying 50 pounds of equipment, drag a mannequin weighing up to 180 pounds through an obstacle course and complete other heavy, sweaty tasks, all in 8 minutes or less.

Female first responders

This is the first in a series of stories about women who work as first responders in Fauquier County. Historically, men comprise most of the police officers, firefighters, medical technicians and paramedics nationwide. That is changing across the nation — and here too.

Latest Fauquier Fire Academy class includes six women

The Fauquier Fire Academy recently graduated 22 new firefighter EMTs, including six women — the most ever in one class.

"I learned a lot very quickly," especially about fire, said April Reed, one of the six women who graduated May 27. Reed had been a collegiate athletic trainer before joining the county's fire department, so she already had experience that helped her with the medic training that is part of the six-month course.

Women can meet the physical challenges of training, Reed said. "I don't know that there is anything that would stop a female from doing it except that females tend to be physically smaller. The biggest thing is not giving up, just having that tough mindset."

Dok Klaus, the 'computer doctor,' celebrates 20th anniversary

By Aimee O'Grady
SPECIAL TO THE FAUQUIER TIMES

Warrenton's "computer doctor" is celebrating his 20th year in business. "We are [still] a small, family-owned business," said Klaus Fuechsel, known to almost everyone as Dok Klaus.

While Fuechsel has been forced to slow down over the past 18 months due to a brain cancer diagnosis, technology still captivates him. He spent the first 20 minutes of a recent interview sharing information about the incredible device keeping his cancer at bay — and him alive and working. "The device I am wearing stops DNA from multiplying so cancer cells cannot be built.

Farms open storefronts, promote regenerative agriculture

By Abby Zimmardi
PIEDMONT JOURNALISM FOUNDATION

Two farms with similar farming practices — Living Pastures Farm and Kinloch Farm — have opened storefronts in the county within the last year; both practice regenerative agriculture and put a premium on promoting community.

Regenerative agriculture benefits the soil, animals, people and the environment by mimicking the natural relationship between animals and the soil, said Jonathan Elliott, farmer and owner of Living Pastures. Soils used in farms across the country are degraded from mismanagement and "we want to rebuild the soils," he said.

One example? The animals live outside, not packed tightly together in an environmentally controlled building.

Capt. Jessica Potter of the Fauquier County Department of Fire, Rescue and Emergency Management

She successfully passed the test, which is the same for men and women, in 7 minutes and 58 seconds, as she remembers it. Only then could she be considered for employment. It wasn't easy, but it was worth it, says Potter, recently promoted to supervisor of emergency medical services for the Fauquier County Department of Fire, Rescue and Emergency Management.

She has some advice for other women considering a career in fire, rescue and emergency services. "I would say: 'Do it.' I think there's a misconception among women that they can't do it, or maybe they were told they can't do it, but you can do it."

Adding women to the ranks of firefighters is a work in progress. Nationwide, just 4% of career firefighters are women, according to the U.S. Fire Service, part of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. In Fauquier County, 16% of 158 firefighters are women, Fire Chief Darren Stevens said. The most recent graduating class of new recruits included six women, the most the department has ever seen in one class, Stevens said.

'If you see one, you can be one'

"Much of our success has been the result of 'word of mouth' recruitment," Stevens said. "Our current staff have done a tremendous job reaching out to potential applicants. We strive to ensure that women are represented for public events and visible in our recruitment efforts," he said. "If you can see one, you can be one."

All Fauquier County firefighters are also trained as emergency medical technicians, so they can respond to fires, crashes and medical emergencies. Fauquier County gradually has increased the number of certified paramedics it employs; paramedics have more medical training than EMTs.

"It's not a job for everybody," Potter, 37, continued. "But if it's something you're interested in, you've just got to challenge yourself a little bit. It's definitely the most challenging job I've been in over the years."

Potter did not choose the career, she said. It chose her. "It was kind of happenstance," she said. A friend was joining a volunteer fire department in Prince William County, and Potter, 18 years old at the time, decided to try it too, first earning credentials as an EMT. She is one of four women, including a battalion chief, who are professional officers in Fauquier County Department of Fire Rescue and Emergency Management.

She since has received additional medical training to become a critical-care paramedic, which allows her to perform minor surgical procedures and provide blood products to victims at accident scenes. She does not ride on the fire trucks like she once did, because her "buggy" carries specialized medical supplies that allow her to provide a range of care, including intubating patients who cannot breathe on their own and performing ultrasounds.

When she is on duty, she goes to all serious incidents in Fauquier County, including fires and car accidents with people trapped in their vehicles. Most of the time, she decides whether to go to the scene of other 911 calls, such as someone who becomes ill at home. Potter's interview with the Fauquier Times was put on hold while Potter drove to a medical call in Old Town Warrenton. As it turned out, no paramedic was needed that time.

She and the other paramedics can be dispatched anywhere within the boundaries of Fauquier County, 647 square miles. "We're able to bring a second set of hands, a second set of eyes to a problem when we weren't able to do that before."

She works 24-hour shifts starting at 6 a.m., although she usually arrives about a half hour early. She shares the firehouse with four or five other people. They have separate sleeping quarters and a common kitchen and living area. She gets 48 hours off after a shift, then she's back for another 24 hours of work. After six or seven shifts, she gets an extra day off. That schedule runs year-round, including holidays and weekends.

Balancing act

With a 3-year-old son and a husband who also works in fire and rescue, family life is challenging. The couple has arranged their lives so that one parent always is home with their son, because finding childcare that fits their schedules is all but impossible. As a result, they don't get to see much of each other.

Christina Shepherd, 24, has a tough mindset, too. After three years of college, she left a job that paid well but felt purposeless to become a firefighter-EMT. She had been a cross-country and track runner through high school and a semester of college and wanted a job that challenged her physically and mentally. She also wanted to serve her community. Her sister briefly thought about becoming a paramedic, and that is what planted the seed for Shepherd's new career.

That's not to say her new job is easy. The hardest part for Shepherd is the lack of sleep that can result from 24-hour shifts with calls in the middle of the night. The long shifts can be so busy that eating regular meals becomes difficult. She remembers a time she started twice to make pancakes for breakfast, only to be called to the scene of an emergency. "We finally had breakfast at 1 p.m. in the afternoon," she said.

Shepherd gets 48 hours off after working 24 hours, and a lot of that time she spends sleeping and recovering from her work shift. "You do sacrifice sleep, food, being with your family. You sacrifice holidays."

Training

Fauquier County Fire and Rescue training includes classroom instruction on fire behavior and other topics, physical education including lifting ladders and dragging fire hoses, and providing basic life-support services to the sick or injured.

By far the largest percentage of emergency calls — 83% — are medical, Assistant Fire Chief Michael Gillam said. That's true in Fauquier County and nationwide, he said.

Firefighter training is a full-time job that encompasses 1,040 hours. Graduates are certified in:

- Firefighting
- Recognizing and handling hazardous materials
- Providing aid to fellow firefighters who are injured or in peril
- Driving fire trucks and other emergency vehicles
- Providing basic emergency first aid as certified emergency medical technicians.

From there, graduates can go on to earn additional certifications to improve their skills. All training is based on requirements by the state of Virginia and the National Fire Protection Association.

"I think there's something in the human heart that really craves challenge, and I think deep down we all know that we can do more than we do," Shepherd said.

Grand jury indicts 16 defendants

A grand jury convened in Fauquier County Circuit Court July 25 and indicted 16 defendants on 22 charges.

Maria C. Argueta, of Warrenton, was indicted on one felony count of driving while intoxicated. She was arrested April 12 and is currently in custody.

April Brooke Bumbrey, of Fredericksburg, was indicted on one felony count of possessing a schedule I or II drug. She was arrested Jan. 14 and was released from custody on a personal recognizance bond.

John Douglas Embrey, of Markham, was indicted on one felony count of grand larceny of a firearm and one felony count of possessing a firearm as a non-violent felon. He was arrested March 9 and is currently in custody.

Steven John Farmer, of Sumnerduck, was indicted on one felony count of threatening to kill or injure another person and directly indicted on one misdemeanor count of reckless driving. He was arrested Jan. 13 and is currently in custody.

Marcus Deon Gray, of Washington, D.C., was indicted on one felony count of grand larceny of a vehicle and one felony count of eluding law enforcement. He was arrested May 13 and was released from custody on bond.

Fire and rescue services still are figuring out how to help employees balance family life with their work, she said. To attract more women into fire service, departments will need to better address the needs of families, including reliable day-care for shifts that start at 6 a.m., when few day-care centers are open.

There is no denying the job is physically demanding. Men generally have more muscle mass than women, but women can use their brains to create workarounds. For example, women can handle heavy hoses using different techniques than men. Potter said, “A lot of women are very technique-based, especially in this job,” she said. “I’m not going to do the job the same as my 300-pound partner.”

Potter must stay in good physical shape because moving people’s bodies is heavy work. “You don’t have to be a big, burly person,” she said. “You just have to maintain your fitness.” Potter works out at a local gym.

Fire departments traditionally have been “boys’ clubs” and turning that around takes time. Potter has run into obstacles because she is a woman. “You don’t always get the same respect,” she said. There are men who believe “You shouldn’t talk to me like that because my mom doesn’t talk to me (like that).”

That sentiment isn’t just within the department, but also comes from patients. For example, Potter once went with a female partner to the home of an elderly woman in distress. When the woman saw them, she said, “I thought I called the fire department.” The patient was confused because she expected men, not women, to be firefighter EMTs.

In another case, a patient wondered why Potter and not her male partner was providing treatment. “He was like, ‘Well, Ma’am, she’s the paramedic. She’s taking care of you.’”

Being a woman in a management role also is challenging. “You really have to be able to advocate for yourself,” Potter said. “I’m a pretty no-nonsense type in general, but I think that being in the fire department for most of my adult life has really kind of made that the forefront of my personality.”

Working as hard as the men isn’t enough, Potter said. “I think as women we have to prove ourselves tenfold. It’s like a lot of the paramilitary organizations where men are used to being in charge.”

Another challenge for women in fire and rescue positions is parental leave. Potter had to use accrued leave to pay for 12 weeks off after the birth of the couple’s son. The federal Family and Medical Leave Act guarantees 12 weeks off after the birth of a child and a job to come back to, but it does not guarantee pay during that leave. Getting enough paid time off to cover 12 weeks of parental leave took five years, Potter said.

Even with 12 weeks’ leave, returning to such a physically demanding job was tough, she said. The challenges went beyond trying to pump milk for the baby when a call came in at the station, and she had to drop everything and go.

“I told people I was so ready to go back to work — like to leave the house to go back — but I was not ready to work 24 hours. I’m like, ‘I guess I’m ready to go back to duty, but I don’t fit in any of my pants, and I’m tired.’”

Light duty assignments for six months after a baby is born would work much better, she said. By then, babies likely are waking up only once during the night, and new mothers are stronger.

“There’s a lot of sexism in the fire department [nationwide],” Potter said, but it gradually is fading as older firefighters retire and younger, perhaps more progressive recruits take their places. “I think we’ll see it less and less, but it’s definitely still there. It’s definitely still very much alive.”

Warrenton Police Department officer has the job she's always wanted

'I don't really feel as if I'm treated differently because of being a female,' says the department's youngest officer

By Colleen LaMay

FAUQUIER TIMES STAFF WRITER

Warrenton Police Department Officer Hannah Stewart, 23, heard the crash before she saw it. She was nearby on another call when a girl with a bright "Student Driver" bumper sticker on her vehicle ran a stop sign and hit a car driven by an older gentleman.

Neither driver was injured, and no passengers were in the vehicles, but both cars displayed twisted metal, smashed panels and deployed airbags. Both vehicles were towed from the scene.

"I know it was my fault," the girl told Stewart in a slightly quavering voice.

"That's why they call them accidents," Stewart said. "Everyone is OK. That is the most important thing."

The girl's mother arrived at the scene, took one look at her daughter's vehicle, and hugged the girl tightly. Stewart gave the young driver a warning instead of issuing a citation. "It's officer discretion," Stewart said. The details of the accident would be part of the paperwork she files on every call she takes during her 12-hour shift, 7 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Being a woman has not held back Stewart's career in law enforcement, she said.

Nationwide statistics tell a different story. Just 12% of law enforcement officers are women, and only 3% of women have leadership positions, according to the 30 X 30 Initiative, an effort to increase underrepresentation of women in policing.

The Warrenton Police Department is doing better than that — much better. Twenty-five percent, or seven of 28 sworn officers, are women, said Officer Rachel Shockey, public information officer for the Warrenton Police Department. Five of those have been hired this year, and more may be coming. "The chief is fully on board with having an equal mix of female and male officers," Shockey said. The Warrenton Police Department has one woman in leadership, a corporal.

"I don't really feel as if I'm treated differently because of being a female, in the community or within the department," Stewart said. She is the youngest officer on the force, hired by the Warrenton Police Department when she was 20. She graduated from the police academy when she was 21.

She looked for jobs in larger jurisdictions, but then she saw that Warrenton was hiring. "I was like, OK, I've never really heard of Warrenton, but I'll check it out." She liked the town — still does.

The road to Warrenton

Stewart has the job she has wanted since she was a child. She had a very difficult childhood, including a problematic relationship with her mother, and the arrival of law enforcement at her childhood home in Florida meant the chaos in her life ebbed, at least for a time. "I always looked up to them," Stewart said of police.

Eventually, her father gained full custody of Stewart and her two sisters, and they grew up in Florida, where her father taught her to shoot. The family moved to Virginia for a time for her father's job.

The physical requirements for the job are not tough for Stewart. She wears 30 to 40 pounds of gear during her shift, including a bullet-proof vest, radio, gun and more. Wearing all that weight can make the job sweaty, though, she admitted.

After the traffic accident, Stewart was called to help a caseworker trying to get help for a potentially suicidal man who did not want to come out of his apartment house to talk. However, there were children in the apartment building, and they were happy to see the police. The kids received stickers. They were all smiles. They waved.

The man never came out, and the police, including Stewart, left.

Warrenton is small — 4.5 square miles — and the police tend to interact with the same people over and over. "For the most part, we have the same individuals that we come in contact with," Stewart said. Sometimes, the stories have happy endings, and Stewart hangs onto those. She recalled one man she saw multiple times for overdosing, disorderly conduct and similar issues.

"I found out that he now has a job, and he's doing well," she said. "Stuff like that makes me happy. I was running calls where he was overdosing or being disorderly on some type of narcotic, and now he's working, making money and doing well for himself.

"He was doing good, so that makes me happy knowing we're making a difference, even if it's one person at a time."

Knowing the people who live here came in handy another time this summer, when Stewart and another female officer helped talk a woman down from a bridge. The woman was threatening to jump, and she had deep cuts on her wrists. Stewart and the other female officer knew the woman from other calls and were able to establish a rapport that ended with the woman safely off the bridge and in the hospital.

Sometimes, women are better able to help other women in crises, Stewart said. "If the person in crisis is a female, they sometimes feel more comfortable talking to a female." Stewart and the other officer who talked the woman off the bridge went to visit her at the hospital, where she was being treated for her cuts and was being held for a psychiatric evaluation.

After the car accident and the mental-health call, Stewart was called to Main Street in Old Town, where a man who appeared to be drunk was walking around shouting at people, including the police.

As Stewart and two other officers handcuffed him, he shouted that the police had ruined his life over a past marijuana arrest. Stewart was unfazed. "You have to take your emotions out of it," she said afterward. "You wake up, get ready for work and leave your emotions at home." The man was charged with being drunk in public.

Stewart is trained for whatever the streets of Warrenton throw at her. "Every call could be dangerous. You never know what to expect," she said. "At least with me, when I get a call, I run it through my head, OK, this is what could happen, this is how I could handle it, and sometimes it just turns out way different than I expected."

Being a police officer will not stand in the way of Stewart's plans for her private life. Her boyfriend is a firefighter undergoing treatment for cancer. She is very careful not to expose him to any illnesses, including COVID.

"When I get home, I douse myself down in the car with Lysol, and I have bottles of hand sanitizer everywhere," she said. "My hands are so dry."

She is looking forward to getting married and someday starting a family with her boyfriend, who will finish his cancer treatment in October.

Stewart thinks she will remain in law enforcement for her whole career. "I don't see myself doing anything else."

From traffic crashes to domestic disputes to cows in the road, Cpl. Emmie Dean loves her job

By Colleen LaMay

FAUQUIER TIMES STAFF WRITER

Cpl. Emmie Dean of the Fauquier County Sheriff's Office works the night shift, 6 p.m. to 6 a.m., patrolling 651 square miles of Fauquier County's highways and narrow byways with her tunes on and a venti-size Starbucks in her cupholder.

"You will never see me without a coffee," she said. "They know me at the Starbucks in Warrenton," she said. "I will go in on my day off, and they recognize me." Her backup after Starbucks closes is Wawa.

The former Starbucks barista is ready for whatever comes her way, from drunk drivers and speeders to suspicious characters and even a hit and run involving a cow in the roadway.

Like other deputies, she never knows exactly what awaits her when she responds to a call from dispatchers. Her most memorable case came one night when she was called to the scene of a one-vehicle accident with no injuries. "And then, when I got there, there was a person dead of an apparent gunshot wound." The dead man was lying beside one of two cars. That night was long.

A college graduate with a bachelor's degree in criminal justice from Radford University, Dean prefers her squad car to a desk. And nights suit her, even though she often misses a full eight hours of sleep — or even more than a few hours' sleep — because of daytime obligations such as 9 a.m. court dates.

Dean is one of 18 women among 132 sworn officers in the Fauquier County Sheriff's Office, according to Sgt. William Kemper, spokesman for the sheriff's office. The department currently has six vacant positions.

That means 13% of sworn officers are women, about the same as the national average, a figure that has remained stubbornly static for decades, according to several studies, including a 2019 study by the National Institute of Justice.

Research into how to boost the number of women in policing and increase the retention and promotion of the best female officers is limited, according to the study. There is also insufficient research for understanding the unique challenges that women officers face and how best to mitigate or overcome these challenges.

According to the study, some preliminary evidence shows women have proportionally fewer use-of-force and citizen complaints, potentially saving departments from costly lawsuits.

The sheriff's office would like to hire more women, but it does not have a specific initiative aimed at recruiting women and finding candidates is difficult, said Major Lowell Nevill, commander of support operations for the sheriff's office. The sheriff's office is hoping to develop partnerships with area high schools and community colleges to increase the number of female candidates.

The sheriff's office has three women in leadership roles, and Dean is one of them. She started working for the sheriff's office part-time in 2014 as a 911 emergency dispatcher. She was sworn in as a deputy in 2016 and worked at the Fauquier County Adult Detention Center before starting patrol in 2019.

The deputy, who stands 5 foot, 2 inches, says she has encountered no disrespect from most of the people she encounters during her overnight shifts.

Dean cannot point to any one factor that led her to a law-enforcement career. She remembers a visit from a law-enforcement officer when she was in elementary school, so maybe that figured in, she said. When she started college, she was interested in forensic science, but she did not enjoy all the chemistry classes she had to take.

She is the first in her family to become an officer. "I think they were concerned, but they've always been really supportive," Dean said. "My family is my biggest support system with this."

It also helps to be married to a

This is the last in a series of three stories about female first responders in Fauquier County.

police officer. Dean is married to a Prince William County officer, so she can always talk about a difficult night with someone who understands. Unfortunately, Dean's spouse is currently working day shifts, which limits the couple's time together.

Dean is a supervisor on her shift, which means that when her fellow patrol officers have a question, they consult with her. While Fauquier sleeps, she and four to seven five officers take calls that range from the odd to the tragic.

Dean must be ready for anything during her 12-hour shifts. She often spends the time it takes between receiving a call for service until the time she arrives thinking through scenarios for what she might encounter.

During two ride-alongs with a reporter from the Fauquier Times, Dean, 30, was busy. Among other things, she conducted checks of premises such as parks that close at dark, worked with another deputy at the scene of a domestic dispute and took a call about a potentially suspicious person walking in a neighborhood with a ski mask and a two-by-four.

Then, there was the hit and run involving a cow that escaped its pasture. The driver, whose car apparently sustained damage including a broken headlight, fled the scene. The cow's injuries were not immediately known, and Dean did not want to have to put down a severely wounded animal and drag it off the road.

As it turned out, before she arrived at the scene, the owner was able to get the cow up and put it back in the pasture with a plan to check it for injuries in the morning. Dean was relieved.

Dean foresees a long career in law enforcement, she says, "I think I will stay in law enforcement," she said. "I enjoy it."

E.B.'s BBQ, which operates from the basement level of Ellie's Place, had a soft opening during the Warrenton Wizard Walk Oct. 15. During the day-long event, they served 100 pounds of pulled pork to an estimated 300 customers. "It was a good start," said Aubree Fetherolf, a partner in E.B.'s.

Fetherolf, 29, has worked for Dial for two years. "I was working as an instructional assistant for Fauquier County Schools and accepted a job at Ellie's Place for extra money. The summer I started at Ellie's Place, I became a single mother, and Zan offered me a full-time position. He's a great manager, and the decision to say 'yes' was an easy one," she said.

Dial said simply, "She worked her butt off, and I offered her a partnership to open E.B.'s BBQ."

The building's landlord is another "good person" that Dial appreciates. "He helped us tremendously with the build-out of Ellie's Place," Dial said. His landlord, who prefers not to be named, is looking for a new location for E.B.'s in Old Town. Fetherolf will run the new business when it relocates.

The name E.B. was chosen by Dial. "I chose the name E.B.'s to represent Ellie, my daughter, and Brian, Aubree's oldest son. The kids are good friends, and the name represents both of our families," Dial said. Fetherolf's other sons, James, age 4, and Dexter, age 3, will have to wait for further expansions to lend their names.

For Dial, family, whether by blood or choice, comes first. "We all look out for one another here. It makes a difference when you can count on your team," he said.

E.B.'s BBQ offers a limited menu of pulled pork and pulled chicken as carry-out only. Sides vary and include coleslaw, green beans, baked beans and chips.

Hours of operation are 11 a.m. to 8 p.m. Thursday through Saturday or until they sell out, whichever comes first.

Access to E.B.'s is through the front entrance of Ellie's Place at 26 Main Street, Warrenton.
